

GLOCAL GALLERIA

UNCOVERING THE UNTOLD BACKGROUNDS
OF THE BRANDS WE KNOW

IN THIS ISSUE

Jhatt Se Aram: How ENO Became Every
Indian's Own
Pg. 01

Desi Divas VS
Global Glam: Who Rules Your Vanity?
Pg. 04

Allen Solly: India's
Brand With A global Soul
Pg. 18

Editor's Note

“Welcome to the first edition of The Glocal Galleria, where we explore the fascinating interplay between global aspirations and local adaptations. The idea of “glocal” has moved far beyond being just a buzzword; it has become the way modern brands thrive in culturally diverse markets like India.

In this issue, we reflect on how both Indian and international companies seamlessly weave themselves into the daily lives of consumers. Take Lakme, a homegrown beauty brand that resonates with Indian identity, or Tide and Dettol, which have become household staples despite their global origins. Fashion labels like Allen Solly and Peter England, though carrying an international lineage, have successfully shaped themselves around Indian sensibilities. It's just a glimpse of how brands are also like Hollywood actors; they act differently in different scenarios.

At the same time, Priniti Foods offers us a reminder that local flavors can stand shoulder-to-shoulder with global giants like McDonald's, serving as proof that “local” is never overshadowed but often amplified by global competition. From Honda's sleek mobility solutions to Da Milano's luxury appeal, the stories we've curated showcase how brands blend international standards with local relevance. They are not just selling products; they are selling a cultural fit, a lifestyle, and above all, trust. As editors, our goal is to spark curiosity and critical thought about how these glocal dynamics influence consumer behavior and shape the marketplace we live in. We hope The Glocal Galleria offers you fresh insights into this ever-evolving world of brands without borders.”

-Aditya Verma

Table Of Contents

1. ENO- JHATT SE AARAM...
2. TIDE : Kyu Chaunk Gaye?
3. DESI DIVAS TO GLOBAL GLAM
4. INTRO TO LAKME
5. PRINITI CHIPS
6. DA MILANO
7. HARPIC : FROM BRITISH...
8. DETTOL : A BRITISH BRAND...
9. HONDA : THE NEW HERO
10. PETER ENGLAND : A STUDY...
11. LOUIS PHILLIPE : A LUXURY IN DISGUISE
12. ALLEN SOLLY : INDIA'S BRAND...
13. STARBUCKS : HOW GLOCALIZATION...
14. MCDONALDS : THINK GLOBALLY, EAT LOCALLY
15. INTERVIEW PAGE
16. FUN & GAMES

JHATT SE ARAM: HOW ENO BECAME EVERY INDIAN'S OWN

Akshay Patidar

LIKE MANY OTHER INDIANS WHO MIGHT NOT KNOW ABOUT THIS, I WAS ALSO UNAWARE UNTIL I SEARCHED - WHO OWNS ENO?

Eno was invented by pharmacist James Crossley Eno in the mid-nineteenth century in Britain's Newcastle as a fruit salt remedy for indigestion, sea-sickness, and diarrhea for ship sailors and workers. It became widely popular among the seaman community due to its effectiveness. Over a journey of more than one hundred and fifty years, it was acquired by several consumer health brands and is currently owned by Haleon. Eno entered the Indian market more than fifty years ago, in 1972. India has been a country where people often consume oily, spicy, and unhealthy street food. Due to these eating habits, Eno became a household name in the country. It has earned a permanent place in every Indian household's refrigerator, whether for its primary use in fighting acidity or for fluffing Dhoklas, a famous Gujarati dish.

However, this didn't happen overnight. It took years of advertising and marketing from the brand to achieve what it is today. The early days of Eno's advertising in India date back to the 1990s, from its "Jhat se Aaram" campaign to the most recent magician campaign featuring Vicky Kaushal. Slowly and steadily, Eno has risen to become the market leader through the effectiveness of its product and advertising campaigns. From its iconic tagline - Kaam shuru karein sirf 6 seconds mein to campaigns such as gadbad gadbad, Eno on-acidity gone, ho jaaye laddoo, welcome back to life, and many more relatable and memorable advertisements. It has secured a place in every Indian's home as well as mind when it comes to an instant solution for acidity. They also launched India-specific flavors in their product range like jeera, ajwain, kala namak, and pudina to maximize their reach.

One more example of Eno's relatability is its campaign during the COVID times, when everyone was locked inside their homes and many were suffering from acidity due to snacking habits. Eno launched the #WhatARelief campaign, a perfectly timed and curated initiative to advertise its product.

All in all, Eno's story is a perfect example of how a brand can consistently remain the market leader and develop a persona that makes people believe it's their very own brand, through innovation and relatable advertising that reflects its adaptability to any culture.

ENO's advertising strategy focuses on simplicity, humour, and mass appeal. Its advertisements show relatable situations, such as overeating at festivals, weddings, or at a daily meal, that lead to acidity in individuals and featuring ENO as a simple and effective remedy. This approach of relatable storytelling has helped the brand to reach across a diverse audience of homemakers, office workers, youths, and older people.

Recently ENO appointed Vicky Kaushal as its first brand ambassador in India. The advertisements are not simply an advertisement, but an experience to entertain and educate, reinforcing ENO's position as a remedy rather than a medicine.

In digital marketing, The brand has a significant presence on several social media platforms such as Youtube, Instagram and Facebook to cater diverse consumers, Eno focuses on catchy videos with influencer awareness to reach a younger audience. ENO pushes marketing anywhere food is involved, whether during a festive season or at a food-related event in culture, linking over-indulgence with the need for ENO for acidity relief.

All in all, Eno's story is a perfect example of how a brand can consistently remain the market leader and develop a persona that makes people believe it's their very own brand, through innovation and relatable advertising that reflects its adaptability to any culture.

: KYU CHAUNK GAYE ?

Aditya

Well, it is Tide, the world's largest-selling brand with a market share of 14% in the global markets. Kyu, chaunk gaye na? Many people assume that Tide is an Indian brand, reflecting its high brand recall value. Entry of Tide in India

In the year 2000, Tide was launched in India. The FMCG market in India can be tricky due to the sheer cultural and economic diversity and the various nuances affecting consumer preferences. The ultimate goal of any detergent is the same, i.e., cleaning clothes. This makes it crucial for marketers to gauge the consumer psyche to ensure that a specific brand stands out amidst the market clutter to win the attention and loyalty of consumers.

As of 2019, Tide has a market share of 13% in the Indian detergent space, placed third on the podium with market leaders Ghadi and Nirma. Tide has carved a space for itself in the mid-tier detergent segment, appealing to the burgeoning middle-class of India.

Most of the decisions regarding household products in India are mainly taken by women, considering they are the homemakers (in most cases). Identifying this, Tide has constantly made women the focal point of their advertising campaigns. In 2017, Tide came up with the #CollarUpWithTideCampaign, conveying the message that dirty collars serving embarrassment are a thing of the past with the arrival of the New & Improved Tide Plus. Once again, realizing the influence of women as homemakers making their families look presentable Indian consumers aspire to buy top brands but are also pretty price sensitive. Tide was able to bridge this gap and find a perfect blend between the two conditions. On the one hand, it tackled the brand power of Surf Excel and sister-brand Ariel through pricing

Tide has regularly come up with campaigns and taglines which have resonated with the public and given the brand a great recall value. "Chaunk Gaye", "Tide hai, toh white hai", "Tide Plus, jo de White Plus" are some of the iconic taglines which have become a part of advertising folklore.

Blending humor with everyday situations faced by the common man, Tide has created a high RQ i.e., relatability quotient in the market. Campaigns like #TideWhite, #TideUltra, #TideGivesExtra, and #CollarUpWithTide have struck a chord with the public and enhanced the emotional engagement of the brand.

"DESI DIVAS VS GLOBAL GLAM: Who Rules Your Vanity ?"

Aditya Verma

mama earth®

WOW
SKIN SCIENCE

M MYGLAMM

If color be to beauty what music is to mood, play on Lakmé is an exception. Founded by J.R.D. Tata in 1952, it remains the only Indian brand that has dominated the domestic market for decades. Lakmé leads in brand recognition, accessibility, and cultural relevance across India. Meanwhile, brands like Maybelline New York and L'Oréal Paris are also favored by Indian women, largely due to their positioning by PR teams as premium choices in the beauty and cosmetics segment.

On Top of the World

The way Lakmé expanded its wingspan from the 1950s to the 21st century is highly commendable. By reaching stores, salons, and professional boutiques, it has consistently demonstrated how a local Indian brand can compete like a global company in this industry alongside other giants. Lakmé's success is also associated with its name, which is derived from the French word for Goddess Lakshmi. However, many people are unaware of this and often believe it to be a European brand an impression that further distinguishes it from other indigenous names in the category.

As we all know, the Indian perspective toward foreign cosmetics or beauty products tends to associate them with luxury and superior quality. In contrast, products from Indian brands are often perceived as cheap knockoffs, potentially harmful or reactive, or simply Ayurvedic formulations that may not be as effective

The way Lakmé expanded its wingspan from the 1950s to the 21st century is highly commendable. By reaching stores, salons, and professional boutiques, it has consistently demonstrated how a local Indian brand can compete like a global company in this industry alongside other giants. Lakmé's success is also associated with its name, which is derived from the French word for Goddess Lakshmi. However, many people are unaware of this and often believe it to be a European brand an impression that further distinguishes it from other indigenous names in the category.

The ELLE 18: Pocket friendly

Another affordable, trendy, and youth-focused choice that emerged in the 1990s under Hindustan Unilever is ELLE 18, which targeted the less premium side of the beauty and cosmetics market. It aimed at a budget friendly audience, primarily college students and young adults in their 20s, as Lakmé is considered a premium segment brand whose sophisticated positioning often drives away the small-pocket audience.

NEW WORLD NEW CHOICES

As the world evolved with the emergence of the Internet, social media, and digitalisation, Nykaa was born in 2012 as a digital beauty powerhouse founded by Falguni Nayar. It began as an ecommerce platform for beauty products and later expanded into omnichannel retail. Today, it is positioned as a house of brands. The House of Nykaa combines seven beauty and five fashion brands owned by FSN E-Commerce, the parent entity of Nykaa.

Other rising stars like Mamaearth, WOW Skin Science, and MyGlamm are performing well and growing at a fast pace in the Indian market. The size of the Indian cosmetics market is around USD 14.6 billion, with approximately 30% attributed to color cosmetics lip makeup being the highest-selling category.

LAKMÉ

by Aditya Chahal

SUMMER
READY
HYDRATED
LIPSMONDAY
MOCHA

LAKMÉ

When you hear the name Lakmé, you might imagine a chic Parisian boutique tucked away on Rue Saint-Honoré, offering luxury cosmetics with French elegance. The name certainly suggests it. But here's the twist: Lakmé is not French at all. It is proudly Indian, born in 1952, and has since grown into one of the country's most iconic beauty brands. The story of Lakmé perfectly fits into the larger conversation of how brands shape perceptions—sometimes by disguising their true identity. The name itself comes from the French opera Lakmé by Léo Delibes, chosen deliberately to give the brand an international, aspirational feel. After all, in the early 1950s, India was still under the influence of colonial hangovers, and “foreign” meant premium. Tatas, who originally launched Lakmé, understood this consumer psychology well. For decades, Lakmé positioned itself as sophisticated and “global,” even though it was manufactured, marketed, and consumed within India. The sleek packaging, French-sounding name, and Western-style campaigns all worked to build an aura of cosmopolitan luxury. Yet, beneath this façade was a homegrown product, catering to Indian women with shades and formulations suited specifically to Indian skin tones. Today, Lakmé is owned by Hindustan Unilever, another multinational giant that itself often wears the mask of being “local.” And interestingly, Lakmé's identity has come full circle. Instead of just riding on its faux-French roots, it has embraced its Indian pride more openly, presenting itself as India's first cosmetic brand that set international beauty standards from within the country. The launch of Lakmé Fashion Week was a masterstroke—it not only reinforced the brand's premium, global image but also rooted it in India's cultural fabric. Lakmé demonstrates the power of branding in blurring lines between the local and the global. What began as an Indian brand pretending to be French has now evolved into a symbol of Indian cosmopolitanism. And in that lies the real lesson: sometimes a brand's identity is less about where it comes from, and more about how it makes people feel.

NEW

9T05 HYA MATTE
LIQUID LIPSTICK

Printiti Chips

(Redefining snacking)

Abhishek Mishra

Market Leader

IN INDIA FOR MANUFACTURING
POTATO CHIPS

(Source-printitfoods.com)

In India we see that there are so many chips and kurkure companies. They always try to cover gen-z's behaviour towards their company most of them belong to foreign countries but India is their biggest market because of its consumer behaviour so I'm gonna talk about the Printiti chips concept, design, marketing and engagement with customers. So, chips is not something about casual things. Especially when we talk about chocolate chips, these are the things which are used mostly for taste. I chose to write about Printiti chips, because of its market value and uniqueness. This is the very first snack which is more about health centric advertisements. They gained students and young audiences.

The Concept Behind Printiti Chips

At the heart of Printiti Chips lies one simple but powerful idea: snacks could be self-expression. Each chip is not just a crisp piece of food, but a mini-canvas where words, designs, or messages can be "printed" — hence the name. Imagine opening a packet of chips and finding fun messages, motivational quotes, or even personalized greetings etched onto each crisp. Whether it is a "Good Luck" chip before an exam, or a "Best Friend" chip to share at a party, Printiti Chips turns casual snacking into a meaningful, playful experience.

The need of Today's Consumer

Modern consumers, I'm talking about particularly Gen Z and millennials, expect three things from snacks: Novelty: Something new that sparks curiosity and makes them share it on social media. Health Consciousness: Options that don't feel like guilty indulgence. And the personalization factor ensure emotional bonding between the product and its consumer

Branding Strategy: Beyond Just snacks

Priniti Chips is not selling food alone; it is selling an experience . The brand positions itself at the intersection of fun, health, and creativity. Tagline: "Every Chip Has a Story." very emotional line, young audience can relate with this line Core Message: Snacks can nourish, entertain, and inspire at the same time.
Target Audience: Youth, young professionals, families who enjoy fun food with a modern twist. The branding logic is simple: if traditional chips are about crunch, Priniti Chips is about the true strength of Priniti Chips lies in its interactive potential . Unlike other snack , consumers are encouraged to engage , collect , and share .

Social Media Campaigns Hashtag: #PrintYourChip Users upload photos of their favorite printed chips, creating organic buzz. Collaborations With educational institutions: motivational chips for students. With NGOs: awareness campaigns about mental health , safety , or environment t, printed directly on the chips. This kind of marketing ensures Printy Chips isn't just a snack — it becomes a lifestyle brand.

"Every Chips Has a Story."

I tried to illustrate the creativity of just snacks . Priniti chips provide not just chips, it is a blend of taste, healthy snacks and craft of advertisements. Audiences relate with this new marketing concept. One thing I noticed about printy chips is that they connect with institute and students. Eventually I would quote this line: this is not just about eating, it's living an experience - one chip at a time. The one chips brand ,I have ever seen with full of creativity and takes on young minds and cover a cultural narratives which can be reasonable to cult audience.

DA MILANO

I T A L I A

Aditya

From Connaught Place to the World: A Family Story Founded in 1989 by Surinder Malik as a leather export firm, Da Milano journeyed from a small store in Connaught Place to an acclaimed name in luxury leather goods. Driven by family values, the brand rapidly expanded, with stores across India and abroad.

The Art of Being 'Foreign': Italian in Spirit, Indian at the Core ; Da Milano beautifully blends its Indian manufacturing heritage with global aspirations. Italian design inspiration, international-sounding branding, collaborations with Italian designers, and European-style collections all reinforce its "foreign luxury" image—despite being a truly Indian creation. Elegant Italian-sounding campaigns and product names ensure customers associate the brand with global exclusivity.

Marketing Techniques: Aspirational, Accessible, and Trustworthy

- Strategic Store Locations: Flagships in luxury malls and leading airports attract cosmopolitan, globally-minded shoppers.
- Lifetime Warranty: Every product comes with a lifetime service guarantee, reflecting a level of confidence and service typical of top-tier global brands.
- Emotional Storytelling: Marketing focuses on not just selling products, but on building an aspirational lifestyle and sense of belonging, framing Da Milano as a community for lovers of international luxury.
- Collections with Global Appeal: Launches like the AW23 Collection showcase innovative European palettes and textures, marketed as "world-class luxury for Indian consumers".
- Multiple Recognitions: Awards and milestones further bolster the brand's elite, foreign-leaning image.

From Surinder Malik's founding vision, Da Milano continues to expand with fresh brands like Rosso Brunello and daring global ambitions. Embracing luxury—with an Italian twist—Da Milano invites its patrons to experience the best of both worlds: Indian manufacture, European style, and unmatched service.

HARPIC : FROM BRITISH CHEMISTS LAB TO EVERY INDIAN HOME

Abhishek Kumar Ram

It all started in the 1920s, when a British chemist named Harry Pickup invented a revolutionary toilet cleaner. His name gave birth to the brand itself Harry + Pickup = Harpic. At a time when cleaning toilets was a messy, dreaded task, Harpic arrived with a promise: a cleaner, more hygienic solution

Harpic did not become famous for its formula. but it's an S-shaped bottle. This simple innovation solved the real problem of cleaning a toilet's hidden spot. The toilet hidden in a bend, a place no brush could reach. The innovation of the bottle changed the Harpic, making it unique. The user focused design sold more than a product.

Harpic's India Story: More Than Just a Cleaner

Harpic started in the UK, but its real mission was discovered in India. For decades, toilets in much of India were neglected or missing altogether. A dedicated toilet cleaner was unheard of—most households relied on harsh acids or regular detergents to clean their toilets.

When Harpic entered the Indian market, it became clear that people were not aware of toilet hygiene. Initially, the product didn't sell well. Instead of just pushing sales, Harpic focused on educating people across India. Slowly, they built trust, and after a few years, Harpic became a symbol of cleanliness in Indian homes.”

Changing Habits, Changing Lives

Nowadays, Harpic is available in over 90 countries, and Harpic India is one of the strongest markets, holding more than 75% of the country's toilet cleaning segment. Harpic didn't just win the segment; it changed the habit. Its biggest success was not just selling more but making people understand that cleaning the toilet is important for dignity, hygiene, and health. This idea became very strong during Swachh Bharat Abhiyan. when toilet cleaning became part of the movement

HARPIC

NAYE JAISE TOILET KE LIYE

HARPIC HAI NA!

10X TOUGH STAIN REMOVAL

5 MINS. ACTION

99.99% GERM KILL

*10x better limescale removal vs ordinary detergents and kills 99.99% germs post 5 minutes of contact with undiluted product.

Harpic's story in India is also tied to powerful campaigns led by India's biggest stars:

Akshay Kumar (2018): Akshay Kumar became the face of Harpic's "Har Ghar Swachh" Mission. He linked toilet cleaning with the mission, making it a national issue. At that time, Harpic packs were introduced to people to reach every household.

Shah Rukh Khan (2025): The Badshah of Bollywood joined hands with the Harpic team. Harpic started the campaign "Harpic Hai Na" with the promise of 10x better cleaning, featuring Shah Rukh Khan. With his family image and trust, Harpic aims to reach every home in India

A Journey That Matters

From a small invention by one man in a British lab to becoming the heartbeat of toilet hygiene in India and a market share leader in the toilet cleaning segment, it has not only grown in India but also improved hygiene standards and restored dignity to millions of homes world wide. From a modest British invention to leading India's toilet cleaning market, the product has revolutionized hygiene, improving standards and restoring dignity across millions of homes worldwide. Harpic holds a commanding 70% market share in India's toilet cleaning segment, which is valued at about ₹2,000 crore—half of the broader ₹4,200 crore surface cleaner market.

DETTOL : A BRITISH BRAND IN EVERY INDIAN HOME

Aditya Chahal

The Foreign Germ-Killer That Feels Like Family

If there is one brand that has quietly made its way into every Indian household and earned blind trust, it is Dettol. The yellow-brown liquid in its green bottle is almost synonymous with cleanliness in India.

Whether it's a scraped knee, a mother adding a capful to the bathing bucket, or the familiar sting of antiseptic in school infirmaries—Dettol feels like it has always belonged here. But the truth is, Dettol is not Indian at all. Launched in 1933 by the British company Reckitt (now Reckitt Benckiser), Dettol entered India during the colonial era. Over the decades, it carefully localized itself. Its ads showed Indian families and Indian doctors, while its taglines spoke the language of trust and protection. What was once a foreign antiseptic slowly transformed into a household essential, woven into everyday routines. The success of Dettol soap and handwash lines further deepened its Indian connect.

During the COVID-19 pandemic, Dettol's identity as a "protector" was pushed to the forefront. Campaigns like "Dettol ka Dhakkan," encouraging people to donate a capful of Dettol to underprivileged communities, showed how the brand positioned itself not just as a product, but as a public ally in India's fight for hygiene. Its sponsorships of schools, hospitals, and health campaigns strengthened this emotional bond. What makes Dettol's case fascinating is how a foreign brand managed to appear more local than many Indian ones. Today, for millions of Indians, Dettol is not a British import but ghar ki safety, maa ka trust, and desh ki immunity. This is the paradox of branding: origin matters far less than perception. Dettol may have been born in Britain, but in India, it grew into something larger—an inseparable part of the national household identity.

inspiredpencil.com

: THE NEW HERO

Aditya Kumar Rai

For the price of an inexpensive car, you can own a Honda.

The company Hero Honda first came to India in the 1980s. The Indian automobile market was still developing, dominated by local players like Bajaj, the customer prioritized affordability, efficiency, fuel and durability over luxury. When they joined hands with the Hero group. This collaboration led to the start of a revolution in the field of 2 wheeler vehicles in India. It also made the company world's largest motorcycle manufacturer. Despite being a foreign player, the company was quite able to understand the motive and taste of the local people what they needed and delivered to them.

By the late 90s, they were able to set up HMSI as a wholly owned subsidiary. Helping them to produce cars and scooters for the local people with very high efficiency. They also invested in local manufacturing plants, reducing the cost of imports and signed a long term deal in India. After the split with Hero, Honda launched its Honda is Honda campaign, a strategy to re-establish the brand's market value and regain customer trust. Even hiring Akshay Kumar as their brand ambassador was a good strategy for Honda as they were able to establish their boots once again in the automobile industry. At that time, Honda sold over 1 million units annually across India subsequently increasing the dealership of Honda.

They started a “Rural area” strategy for the people of India as they were quick to understand the fact that they were only targeting the urban areas of the nation, leaving out the rural areas, which is a big chunk of India’s population. Therefore, they were able to expand to the rural areas, subsequently providing a motorcycle to each of the households at a very affordable price. They were also quick in researching the vigilance authorities to understand the need and requirements of the local people of that area, and they created vehicles according to the daily needs at an affordable price. They therefore place a strong emphasis on the opinions of trusted individuals or word of mouth. Honda staff would personally go to the villages and talk to the people and held seminars for the betterment of their lives. The fact that Honda was able to provide a very budget friendly and efficient motorcycle for local Indian people seems to be a game changer in the field of automobile industry .

They were able to understand the psychology of the Indian audience even after being catered as the foreign company and even after breaking up the partnership with Hero in earlier time, they were still able to ground their boots all alone in the field without any specific challenge. Hero Honda’s journey is a powerful case study in how a company, even after a significant split, can succeed by truly understanding and serving its customer base.

PETER ENGLAND : A STUDY IN NAVIGATING THE LOCAL VS GLOBAL APPAREL MARKET

BE EVERYTHING YOU LOVE

PETER ENGLAND

Aman Dwivedi

Peter England is a prominent Indian menswear brand that serves as a fascinating case study in navigating local identity versus global aspirations. Though often seen as a global brand, its journey is deeply connected to the Indian consumer, making it a prime example of glocalization. The brand's success is largely due to its strategy of thinking globally but acting locally. By blending global aspirations with local realities, Peter England has established a strong presence in the dynamic Indian market.

Despite its global facade, Peter England's core market and roots are firmly in India. The brand is part of Aditya Birla Fashion and Retail Ltd. (ABFRL), a major Indian fashion conglomerate. Its product development, pricing, and distribution networks are specifically tailored to the Indian consumer's preferences and purchasing power.

It has effectively cultivated an image of global appeal. The brand name itself evokes a sense of European heritage and classic style.

Its collections frequently mirror international fashion trends, and marketing campaigns project a modern, aspirational masculinity that appeals to a globally-aware audience. This strategic branding enables Peter England to compete with international players within the Indian market.

In India, Peter England has strategically positioned itself as an affordable premium brand, making fashion accessible to a broader audience. This pricing strategy is vital in a market where value for money is a key consumer driver. The brand's extensive retail presence across Tier 1, 2, and 3 cities highlights its commitment to reaching consumers throughout India. Marketing campaigns often feature Indian models and settings, with messaging that connects with the aspirations and cultural nuances of the Indian male, creating a strong local connection.

Peter England's strategy leverages the prestige of a "global" brand while ensuring its products are relevant and accessible to the Indian consumer. The brand operates in the fiercely competitive Indian apparel market, facing challenges from both international giants and strong local players. Its ability to continue balancing global trends with local insights through its glocal approach will be crucial for its future growth and leadership in the Indian menswear segment.

LOUIS PHILIPPE A LUXURY IN DISGUISE

Aditya Kumar Rai

Brands may scream luxury based upon their foreign names and marketing skills, Indian brands have successfully made their presence felt at the international market for their quality, price and innovative ideas. These foreign named brands seem to be global for a lot of their consumers and knit a perception in the brains as a tag of foreign brand and have a high chance that even the Indians won't be able to figure out if it's a foreign or Indian brand.

Louis Philippe is one of such brands. It is a Bengaluru based premium menswear brand which was created in 1989. The brand adopted its name from the former French King Louis Philippe, reigning from 1830-1848. It comes under the lifestyle division of Aditya Birla Group. The brand epitomizes fine clothing offering a range of formal, semi-formal clothing and accessories for men. It started as a shirt company only but it quickly capitalised on the idea of being a complete men's fashion brand.

It has more than 300 stores all across India across 100 cities, apart from this, it has presence in the international market too such as in Qatar, Kuwait, Nepal. It has also achieved certain milestones as well, being awarded TRUE Zero waste GOLD CERTIFICATION, first company in India to do so. The brand has introduced a number of out-of-the-box ideas that has led to an increase in their sales at a rapid pace. Indian luxury brands are increasingly making a significant impact at the global level due to their commitment towards their consumers, culture and the market too. Global exposure through digital platforms, strategic communication, influencer marketing has helped brands like Louis Philippe to grow at a rapid pace and rate. The adopted foreign name also helps to make people see it as a reflection of globalisation and the increasing influence of western culture in India particularly in India.

Because of this strategy, companies like Louis Philippe give their names in a foreign context since the psychology of consumers in India is that they get attracted to foreign names easily and believe that the quality of product will be good. It is also because we believe that the quality of the product of a foreign brand would be far superior than an Indian one, therefore they go for a foreign brand.

LOUIS PHILIPPE

Furthermore, they provide a good quality product at affordable rates according to the Indian consumer market that makes the consumer satisfied, therefore it is quite easy for these brands to grow on a higher scale as compared to the other brands that might be having an Indian name to it.

Louis Philippe's mastery of the 'glocal' approach is the undisputed driver of its success. By seamlessly blending global standards with Indian sensibilities, evident in iconic campaigns like "The Upper Crest," the brand has not just won trust but also significant market share. This strategy has powered its impressive growth, with revenues crossing ₹7,500 crore, cementing its position as the undisputed leader in India's premium menswear landscape.

: INDIA'S BRAND WITH A GLOBAL SOUL

Aditya Raj

When you hear the name Allen Solly, it sounds like a cool, Western brand, right? But surprise—this popular brand is actually Indian! Founded in 1744 in England and later acquired by India's Madura Garments in 1993 Part of Aditya Birla Group.

Allen Solly is famous for smart casual wear that combines comfort with a dash of fashion. Their bright, colorful shirts quickly became a favorite among young Indians who wanted to dress sharp but stay relaxed.

this brand revolutionized fashion space with the bold Concept of Friday Dressing. The brand's famous line, "Wear Your Style," encourages people to be confident and bold in their fashion choices.

Though it looks international, Allen Solly really understands Indian tastes. Their clothes suit our climate and daily life perfectly. That's why it remains a top choice for office wear and casual outings alike. It's a great example of how Indian brands can appear global yet stay close to home.

Allen Solly was quite able to understand the aspirations of the local people—what they needed and how they wanted to express themselves.

By the late 90s, they had successfully positioned themselves as a brand that offered a refreshing alternative to the monotonous formal wear. They invested in local manufacturing and a strong retail network, reducing the cost of imports and establishing a wide-reaching presence across the country.

After its successful "Friday Dressing" campaign, Allen Solly launched subsequent campaigns like "My World, My Way" to re-establish the brand's market value and connect with a younger, more modern audience. This strategy, coupled with a focus on innovative designs and quirky advertisements, helped them regain customer trust and become a household name in casual and semi-formal wear. At that time, Allen Solly's collections became a staple in the wardrobes of urban professionals, subsequently increasing the number of their exclusive brand outlets and multi-brand stores.

Allen Solly has masterfully evolved from a domestic leader to a global powerhouse. Propelled by iconic advertising, it now commands revenues over ₹5,000 crore with a vast international retail footprint, cementing its status as a successful global Indian brand.

HOW “GLOCALIZATION” TURNS A GLOBAL BRAND INTO A LOCAL HERO

]Anil Kumar

Being yourself means everything to us.

Starbucks: it's not just some faceless global coffee overlord, despite what grumpy indie café owners might mutter. Starbucks went all-in on this thing called “glocalization.” Yeah, I know, corporate buzzwords. But this strategy actually works for them—think of it as the brand sneaking past your defenses and making itself right at home, wherever “home” happens to be. You cruise into a Starbucks in Beijing, Tokyo, or Mumbai, and it's not just overpriced lattes— they've got a vibe and menu that feels shockingly familiar for locals. You want proof? Look at their food and drinks. Sure, you can always score your basic Caffè Latte or Americano.

But where Starbucks really flexes is by whipping up stuff people actually want to eat and drink where they live. For example, in China, they toss in the Red Bean Green Tea Frappuccino (sounds a little wild, but people are obsessed) and even mooncakes during festivals. Total crowd-pleaser. Swing over to Japan, and suddenly it's sakura this, sakura that— cherry blossoms lattes everywhere every spring. India? They basically teamed up with Tata and loaded the menu with Elaichi Mawa Croissants and spicy masala drinks. It's not just a boring global menu stamped everywhere. But hey, Starbucks isn't just about the drinks.

They're going for that "third place" energy—a hangout that's neither your office nor your couch. Their stores? Actually kind of cool. In Kyoto, they built a shop straight-up inside a traditional machiya townhouse. Low roofs. Tatami mats. Basically, a miniature Zen retreat where you can mainline caffeine. Beijing places mix slick modern looks with Chinese wood work and legit artwork. The massive Roastery in Shanghai even makes a tea ceremony look like a circus act (in a good way).

And Amsterdam? First shop there set up shop in an old bank vault with reclaimed wood everywhere. It's got that moody, Dutch, artsy feel. But let's get real—none of this would work without local street cred. Starbucks isn't just plopping shops down and calling it a day. They actually try to fold themselves into the community, corny as that sounds. Baristas greet you in the local lingo, making the whole "welcome, friend" thing feel a bit more real. Plus, they're big on teaming up with local charities, tossing support behind festivals, and if you're into ethical coffee talk—yeah, they're doing sustainable pro grams in Latin America, supporting the farmers, all that stuff.

Bottom line? Starbucks didn't roll out the exact same boring playbook everywhere. They built something with a bit of soul by bending with the local winds—global consistency on the outside, hometown hero on the inside. Sort of like a coffee chameleon. This glocalization strategy proves that to truly connect with people around the world, you have to be willing to embrace the unique soul of each place you call home.

“THINK GLOBALLY, EAT LOCALLY”

Anil Kumar

McDonald's used to be the poster child of American fast food, but in India? Yeah, they totally tossed that one size-fits-all vibe out the window. They went all in on the “glocalization” trend, which is like mixing global swagger with local flavor. Honestly, it's kind of genius.

Flipping the Menu

You can't just stroll into a McDonald's in Delhi and order a Big Mac—nope. Huge chunks of the population avoid beef and pork for religious reasons. Did the big M freak out? Nah. They just axed beef and pork altogether (yeah, really!) and whipped up stuff people here actually wanna eat. Enter the Mc Aloo Tikki—a spicy potato burger. Sounds weird at first, but it's basically crack for your tastebuds if you live in India. You ever seen people get hyped for a burger made out of potatoes? Only in India.

Homegrown Ingredients

Now, they didn't just slap any old thing on a bun. McDonald's got cozy with Indian farmers and suppliers, spent years setting up a whole cold supply chain (fancy term for “keep the fries crispy, please”). Not only does this mean the lettuce isn't limp, but it also props up the local economy. Plus, it keeps food fresh and prices in check. Everybody wins—except maybe the guy who still misses his American burger, but hey, adapt or starve.

Culture Vibes, Marketing on Point

Marketing? Oh, they went hard. None of that tone-deaf, lost-in-translation stuff. They kept it real—used Hindi, local slang, old-school slogans like “purane zamaane ka daam” (basically “Pay like it's the good old days!”). Picked up viral catchphrases, rolled out “I'm loving it” in ways that actually sound good in Indian languages. Toss in a few charity tie-ins, like polio drives, and suddenly McDonald's isn't just another foreign fast food spot. It's practically the neighbor next door who shows up to family functions.

Cheap Eats? You Bet

Look, India loves a deal. Mickey D's knew the drill—they kept prices so low, it made London look like a rip-off by comparison. Penetration pricing, if you wanna get all econ-nerd about it. This is why the McChicken doesn't set you back an entire paycheck here. Bottom line? McDonald's didn't just pop a few spicy sauces on their burgers—they went full local, soaked up the culture, slid into the community, and made sure nobody went broke buying a snack. In the great game of world domination through fries and shakes, their India play book should seriously be required reading.

INTERVIEW PAGE

Subho Sen Gupta : Entrepreneur.
Marketing & Advertising Consultant.
Career Advisor & Coach. Founder and Chief Belief Officer POSSIBLE Creations
Private Limited

1. Many global brands present themselves as “local” in new markets. From your perspective, does this cross an ethical line, or is it simply smart marketing?

He said that Many global brands adopt a “local” identity in new markets as a strategic move to resonate with domestic consumers. This approach multinational companies tailor their messaging, visuals, and endorsements to align with local cultural sensibilities. For instance, the French talcum powder brand Enchanteur employed Indian actors and regional talent in its advertising campaigns to appeal to indigenous audiences.

From an ethical standpoint, this strategy remains acceptable as long as the brand does not falsely claim a local origin. If a foreign brand explicitly presents itself as “Indian” or misleads consumers about its provenance, it crosses into unethical territory by distorting truth for commercial gain. However, if the brand transparently maintains its global identity while adapting its marketing to local tastes, the practice is not only ethical but also a smart and culturally sensitive marketing tactic.

2. What risks do companies face if consumers realize that a brand portraying itself as local is actually foreign-owned? Could such a revelation damage trust permanently?

Not necessarily. For example, Bata has never claimed to be an Indian brand—it is originally Czech. Yet, it has become deeply accepted and trusted in India. This shows that in many cases, consumers may not mind foreign ownership as long as the brand delivers consistent quality, affordability, and cultural relevance. Therefore, the revelation of foreign origins does not always damage trust permanently; what matters more is how the brand positions itself and meets consumer expectations.

3. In your opinion, what drives consumer loyalty more strongly: the authenticity of a brand's origin, or the relevance and quality of the product itself?

Consumer loyalty is shaped more by the relevance and quality of a product than its origin. People usually stick with brands that meet their needs and deliver consistent value. However, origin does hold importance in certain cases. For example, in whiskies or Scotch, authenticity of origin greatly influences consumer preference. Similarly, with mangoes, one may enjoy the fruit generally but still choose favorites like Alphonso, Hapus, or Ratnagiri. So while origin can matter in specific categories, quality and relevance remain the stronger drivers of loyalty.

4. Do you think regulators like Government bodies should step in when global companies disguise themselves as local brands, or should it be left to the consumer's judgment?

Yes, government bodies should step in because false claims cannot be allowed. If companies mislead consumers by disguising their origin, it creates unfair practices and can lead to lawsuits. Regulatory oversight ensures transparency and protects consumer trust.

5. If you were consulting a global brand entering a culturally diverse market like India, what locally relevant strategies would you recommend without compromising the company's global identity?

The strategy should be to connect with the local lifestyle and make the brand feel like a natural part of people's daily lives. A company can adapt its product slightly to suit local tastes without losing its global identity. For example, Ferrero Rocher, though a foreign chocolate, became popular in India by offering a sweeter version compared to the more bitter taste preferred abroad. Similarly, brands can localize while still preserving their core image.

BY ADITYA VERMA

FUN AND GAMES

DA MILANO
ITALIA

EXIT

FAMOUS BRAND WORD SEARCH

Y L L O S N E L L A Z B S D S
S P R I N I T I F O O D N E D
D A M I L A N O P T G A A T
H A R P I C B A D E T T O L
O O E A D S M I T H C E G
M D L N D G I T I D E T T O
A L O A S T A R B U C K S
M A K M C N I B O N C P Y
A R K L M E D O P A M O I
C C B E H A N D O H P L M
R N H A C T E S C L G M I F
H I Y L N I R E E R I H F L K C
I C K Y T P N D T G D G I J
K G F D S A O H J K S L J H
L Q W E R T Y U I O P A D K
P P E T E R E N G L A N D S L

Find the following brands:

- ALLENSOLLY
- DAMILANO
- DETTOL
- ENO
- HARPIC
- HONDA
- LAKME
- LOUISPHILIPPE
- MCDONALDS
- PETERENGLAND
- PRINITIFOODS
- STARBUCKS
- TIDE

8					5
	7		9				4
		9		7	8	3	2	5
3		1		9			5
		6				1
	9			3		6		2
2	8	3	6	5		7
	1				2		8
			1					9

THE TEAM

EDITOR IN CHEIF

ADITYA VERMA

EDITOR AND CREATIVE HEAD

ADITYA

DESIGNERS

ADITYA

ADITYA VERMA

Akshay Patidar

WRITERS

ADITYA KUMAR RAI

ABHISHEK MISHRA

AKSHAY PATIDAR

ABHISHEK KUMAR RAM

ADITYA RAJ

ANIL KUMAR

AMAN DWIVEDI

ADITYA CHAHAL

ADITYA

ADITYA VERMA